A: The data you are extracting will almost always be in the order of gigabytes. The transfer of that data can be on a very expensive interface, and transferring even 100,000 records over the internet will cost you money. Not only is it expensive, but the data will also be subject to external events such as the internet going down. You need to think about where you store your data. If you have a local server, then you can store the data directly. Otherwise, store it in a database. The latter is a bit more complicated to set up, but it's not too difficult. You can store data in a database on a remote server, but that means the data is not local.

Mexico Constitution of 1857 The 1857 Constitution of Mexico was enacted on 11 February 1857. It was one of the first constitutions promulgated in the nineteenth century following the liberal regime's victory over the conservative oligarchy of the former government of Guadalupe Victoria. It was first published in the government gazette El Porvenir on 11 July 1857 and was submitted to the electors on 11 September 1857. It was approved on 18 October 1857. The new government worked swiftly to amend many of the terms of the previous constitution, and began discussing many of the questions that it would be working to resolve. The new constitution was a part of the liberal agenda. It put a distance from the Catholic Church and it abolished slavery, thus beginning to change the framework of the country. Among other things, it provided for property rights, universal male suffrage, secret and mixed electoral colleges, term limits, limited age restriction for presidency, and freedom of the press. It also instituted a bicameral congress, consisting of a lower house (the Chamber of Deputies) and a senate. The congressional republicas (popularly known as the triumvirates) became the main political players in Mexican politics. The Constitution of 1857 was a major departure from the previous constitution and is considered the start of the second Mexican Republic, for which the Mexican Empire is often also considered.

Preamble The preamble, which explains the motivations behind the document, identifies the government's basic principles, one being that it was "inspired by the concept of democratic liberty." It also lists the most important aspects of the Constitution, like liberty, the autonomy of the Mexican people, and equality before the law. References External links Text of 82157476af
